CONFERENCE

The role of pharmacy practice research (PPR) has expanded in the past 50 years to encompass areas such as the clinical, behavioural, economic and humanistic implications of pharmacy practice. Furthermore, it is because PPR proves the value of pharmacy services that many of these are commissioned and paid for, and PPR will continue to influence the development of new services in the future.

This conference aims to increase the quality and quantity of pharmacy practice research by exchanging and disseminating information at an international level. New networks and collaborations will be established on major themes for experienced researchers and higher degree students.

PhD students and their supervisors are invited to this unique international conference to present their work and to start building new global pharmacy networks. Researchers, academics, professional organisations and practitioners involved in research are also invited.
